‘The Next European Commission President Must be a Digital President’

European Union Digital Champions Issue Open Letter to Lead Contenders for European Commission President

EU Digital Champions urge Commission presidential candidates to put forward a digital strategy fit for the 21st century

Call on contenders to unite behind a four-point agenda to transform Europe into a connected, wired and dynamic continent

(BRUSSELS, Belgium) – The European Digital Forum, a think tank spearheaded by the Lisbon Council, a Brussels-based think tank, and Nesta, the UK’s innovation foundation, released an Open Letter to the Contenders for European Commission President, signed by European Union Digital Champions. These Ambassadors for the Digital Agenda of Europe who are appointed by their respective governments, encourage the lead Commission presidency candidates to include a bold and ambitious digital strategy in their electoral platforms and unite behind a four-point agenda.
Prior to the public announcement, the Open Letter was sent to the main contenders, with a request to respond. Jean-Claude Juncker, candidate for European Commission President for the European People’s Party (EPP), seized the opportunity, sending a letter in which he highlighted that the digital single market is one of his five top priorities. He writes: “I am convinced that the digital theme must move beyond the world of techies. Digital must become a priority of mainstream politics in Europe.”

The Open Letter will be formally presented by Gesche Joost, digital champion of Germany and design research professor at the Berlin University of the Arts, at a press conference held in the margins of the European Business Summit in Brussels on 15 May 2014. The Open Letter will also be circulated at the Brussels launch of the European Digital Forum on 22 May 2014, in the presence of European Commission President José Manuel Barroso and Vice-President Neelie Kroes.
